Realism

In the nineteenth century, Romanticism was replaced by Realism. Realism (realism) can be defined as a style of art or literature that seeks to depict life as it is, without idealization or sentimentalization. It emphasizes the depiction of everyday life, the common man, and social issues.

Realism was a reaction against the idealized and often fantastical world of Romanticism. It sought to depict life as it truly is, without any embellishment or romanticization. Realism was a movement that emphasized the depiction of everyday life, the common man, and social issues.

One of the key figures of Realism was Honoré de Balzac, who is often referred to as the father of modern realism. Balzac wrote a series of novels known as La Comédie Humaine, which depicted life in Paris during the early 19th century.

Another important figure of Realism was Émile Zola, who is known for his novel Germinal. Zola's work was part of a larger movement known as Naturalism, which sought to depict life as it truly is, without any romanticization or idealization.

Realism had a significant impact on literature and art, and it continues to influence these fields today. It has been described as a reaction against the excesses of Romanticism and a move towards a more realistic and grounded depiction of life.
In the end, Richardson (Richardson) tells Pamela, she is now ready to be married.

"Well, he is kinder, kinder, and thank God, purely recovered. ... How charmingly he looks, to what he did yesterday. Blessed be God For it!
